56. Use the following description to create a Business Process Modeling Notation (BPMN) activity diagram of Nora's process.

Nora accesses the Amazon.com website to purchase a favorite musician’s latest album. She searches for the musician’s name. Amazon displays the results of the search, and she selects the correct entry. She samples the music and then decides whether to purchase the album. If she decides to purchase the album, then she must decide whether to purchase a physical CD or just download the MP3 files.

If she decides to purchase the CD, she clicks on the buy now button. Since she is an Amazon Prime member, she automatically receives free 2-day delivery and the item is charged to her credit card. She then waits 2 days for the delivery of the CD. When it arrives, she can enjoy the music.

If she decides to purchase the MP3, she selects that option and again clicks on the buy now button. She is charged for the item and taken to a page to download her music. She downloads the album, and then she can enjoy her music.

57. Use the following description to create a Business Process Modeling Notation (BPMN) activity diagram of Jeremy’s process.

Jeremy is using his bank’s online banking site to pay for his new phone. He logs onto the bank’s website by entering his user name and password, confirming his SiteKey. After access to his account, he selects the Bill Pay tab. He searches to see if the phone company is already listed in the “Pay To Accounts.”

If the phone company is not listed, he clicks on the option to “Add a New Pay To Account.” He fills in the information for the phone company, including the name, address, account number, and phone number. After completing the entry, he is taken back to the list of “Pay To Accounts.”

If the phone company is listed (or if he just completed entering the new account), he enters the amount of the payment. Then, he selects the option to set up a recurring payment. He enters the number of payments. Then, he selects the date that the payment should be sent each month. He then logs out of the bank’s online banking site and closes his browser.

Caitlin is planning to run in the local July 4th 5K run. She wants to register online, but she forgot the websites URL. So, she navigates to Google and starts a search for the site. She selects the registration site from the search results. Once at the site, she selects the option to register for the 4th of July run. She fills in the registration form and provides her credit card information for payment.

After completing her own registration, she decides to register the other members of her team. One-by-one, she enters the registration information for the team member and pays for their entry. After completing all the registrations, she provides a user name and password so she can return to the site to see their results after the race. She logs out of the site and closes her browser.
